Mayans believed that maize (corn) was a gift from the gods. And through this gift they could experience life, death, and everything in between.

To show their appreciation for the maize and other various forms of agriculture, they often made works of art involving agriculture and maize in some way.

In the pictures shown here, you will find many examples of how the Mexican people from the past and current generations present their agriculture-dependent culture and how they depict maize, seeds, and flowers in their art.
